The "Living Boundary Monument" in the Huangsha Changsha Sea Area

In recent years, despite facing various difficulties and even risking their lives, fishermen in the central region still insist on going out to sea to fish. As a result, fishermen who often fish in Huangsha and Changsha fishing grounds have truly become "living boundary markers" at sea, and have made positive contributions to defending the sacred maritime island sovereignty of the motherland.

Hanoi (VNA) - In recent years, fishermen in the central region have persisted in fishing despite facing various difficulties and even risking their lives. As a result, fishermen who often fish in Hoang Sa and Truong Sa fishing grounds have truly become "living landmarks" at sea, making positive contributions to defending the country's sacred maritime island sovereignty.

Dang Dinh Su Viet, 42, has been engaged in aquatic fishing for 25 years. To him, Hoang Sa and Truong Sa fishing grounds are like his own flesh and blood. Except for days with bad weather, he spends most of his time fishing at sea. Dang Dinh Su

Viet, a fisherman in Son Tra District, Da Nang City: "I go out to sea every month to make a living. Hoang Sa and Truong Sa are our traditional fishing grounds for many years. No matter where I go, I will never forget it."

Hoang Sa and Truong Sa are the traditional fishing grounds for fishermen in the central region and even across Vietnam for many years. Insisting on making a living there is a way for fishermen to contribute to defending the country's sacred maritime island sovereignty.

Tran Chih-Tin, a fisherman from Duc Phu District, Quang Ngai Province: "Our ancestors used to fish in the Hoang Sa Truong Sa fishing grounds. Now it is our turn to carry on this tradition. When any accidents happen, we can contact the coast guard and fish inspection forces at any time."

Now, fishermen no longer go alone, but go out to sea in groups to fish. In this way, not only the fishing efficiency is improved, but also they can take care of each other when accidents happen.

In addition to implementing the policies and propositions of the Party and the State, fishermen who fish in the Hoang Sa Truong Sa waters not only bring economic benefits to their families and even the country, but also make positive contributions to combating illegal acts that infringe on the country's territorial sovereignty.

Nguyen Thanh Thuy, deputy political commissar of the Border Guard Command of Da Nang City: "Fishermen provide our border guards with very valuable information, which helps to defend the country's territorial sovereignty. Every fisherman who goes out to sea to fish is a 'living boundary monument' in the Vietnamese waters."

Various difficulties and crises can never stop the determination of fishermen in the central region to go out to sea to fish. Every day, one fishing boat after another leaves the port to maintain normal fishing operations in the country's traditional waters. It can be said that the fishermen are the "living boundary markers" who defend the sovereignty of the sacred ocean islands of the motherland day and night. (End)
